What do we now know about the origins of plants on land, from an evolutionary and an environmental perspective? The essays in this collection present a synthesis of our present state of knowledge, integrating current information in paleobotany with physical, chemical, and geological data. The origin of land plants was one of the most important events in the history of life on Earth. It was a major macroevolutionary event in its own right, with profound ecological consequences, but it also had enormous effects on the environment of planet Earth, altering atmospheric composition, weathering and soil formation, etc., and hence climate and biogeochemical cycles.

Some of the plants originally described by Kidston and Lang in their classical monograph series (, a,b, a,b) are the best known and most detailed fossil land plants [e.g., Aglaophyton major (D. S. Edwards ; Remy and Hass)]. Other taxa remain very incompletely known.
